

Zero Mass

A black and white illustration of a bedroom. The room features a bed with a headboard and footboard, two nightstands with lamps, and a window with blinds. The entire scene is rendered in a style of fine, parallel lines, creating a textured, almost vibrating effect. The lighting is dramatic, with strong highlights and deep shadows.

Check-in Paperwork

She walks with a four-year-old's undeveloped coordination, and jumps as if she's in a sack race.
She plays with the clipboard's clip as her mother completes the intake forms.
Her mother ignores her, so she talks to herself with quiet reverence, as a wildlife watcher would talk to an eagle riding on an airstream.
The chair is too big for her to sit down on, so she scales it with an ease that leaves me looking on with quiet reverence.

Poets At The Beach

As night gives way to dawn a bright orange lateral bolt lights up a soft, dry sandscape and its carpet of bare feet indentations.
Beach bums walk here, bar backs walk here,
Walmart greeters walk here.
They speak as they open striped umbrellas, speak as they spot boats in the sea lanes, speak as blowing sand clings to their hair.
There are metaphors and similes and phrasemaking in their language, enough to put an image in every empty picture frame up and down this coast.

Television News

Addie and I sit on the couch she tore up as a puppy, watching as floodwaters tear up Kerrville, Texas.
Her head rests on my stomach.
Her eyeballs are lidding over.
Her legs are stretched to their maximum length.
Without even understanding what a flood is Addie knows I'll keep her safe from it.

Papered Over

Crabgrass and porcelain are claiming my lawn;
I knock over a lamp
turning it on in the dark; I put my hearing aids in and they fall right back out; justice miscarried sweeps me up with every newsbreak.
When emotion is spent,
like blank wallpaper
what's left should be unremarkable.

Landing

We're coming into San Francisco.
The fog clouds are lapping the hills as ocean waves lap a shore.
I'm pinching my nostrils with thumb and forefinger and blowing as hard as I can.
The seatback trays are upright.
The screens have gone blank;
I can no longer watch the movie over the shoulder of the guy one seat in front of me.

Snowballs, 1963

Children just home from school drop their textbooks and run outside.
They grab handfuls of powdered snow and pack them into coherent balls.
Fords and Pontiacs slide along the street, their tire treads filled with white frosting.
Snowballs crash into windshields, and harried men roll down their windows and yell, angry that their youth is gone, but angrier that the young will become like them.

Nature Walk

In a little over an hour we've covered plumbing, hardware, and flooring.
By mid-afternoon we'll reach appliances, shelving, and paint.
If humans are part of nature then what humans make is part of nature, and the expanding anchors that we pick from our Lowe's nature walk will go perfectly alongside the crocuses.

In Line At The Checkpoint

She's on the other side of a retractable belt that hooks from one stanchion into another.
She's an African villager abroad, many miles over land and water from where baskets are balanced on heads.
She wears a fiesta of multi-hued fabrics that leave neither skin nor figure exposed.
At the end of her dangling left arm a hand that's ground seed into flour and corn into meal
holds a cell phone.

Comparisons

In the men's health club
I look at the beards-- heavy from the right ear to the left ear, or malnourished at the ears and overfed at the chin, or meager all over except for a substantial mustache.
I hear in the men's conversations voices deep and stentorian or high and reedy.
I watch them train with weights, knowing the man who benches five-hundred and the man who benches two-fifty both have white seminal fluid.

Ownership

Lost somewhere on Emma Creek Road
I came upon a neat stack of timber in front of a hardwood tree collective.
Nearby, a lone brown horse with a white patch on its chest stood in a well-tended pasture.
Even a hundred yards away
I was the closest thing to it.
The horse owned the pasture and the lime green hills behind it and the ashen clouds above it.

Fever

A low-grade fever powdered the city as it always does,
only today we paid it notice:
A woman attaching a hinge plate to a door felt the final screw tighten after ten turns; a junior-high student closed her ring binder, and felt the snap as the edges met precisely;
a rock climber found the perfect foothold;
a vocalist hit a true f sharp;
even I, who can't tell from three yards away if a valve is open or closed was running a fever that told me.

Silent Meditation

She closes her eyes and concentrates on her breathing and the trickle of water from a tabletop fountain.
A hundred things, all meaningless, invade her meditative space, and she fights them off with passive acceptance.
But sometimes her empty mind longs for laughter, so Liberty Mutual's Doug and his emu get invited in for the chuckle she needs, and sent away without selling a policy.

Driving Past The Drury Inn

New flying interchange ramps joining I-10 and Loop 1604 swirl around this firmly planted local landmark.
Every day I travel over this interchange, not knowing the applied science behind this illusion of flight.
If I took the elevator to the top floor of the Drury Inn I'd do so not knowing how it works.

Grackles

It's market day in Asheville.
Grackles join the crowd of gigantic shoppers, unfazed by the size of these spillers of cashews, banana chips, and cheese cubes.
They mingle closely with these four-limbed creatures, yet dodge their sandals and sneakers with ease.
The wingless, featherless giants spend their money, and leave with loaves of Italian bread poking out of canvas bags while the grackles eat for free.

Attraction

A mother pulls her young child across the street in a red unfolded multipurpose cart.
The sky is an optically gentle blue.
The front lawns are oceans of green with brown and bare islands.
The mother swings the cart around when they reach the other side of the street.
Today is watering day, and on the wet grass droplets twinkle in the sunlight.
As mother and daughter head down the sidewalk bushes fronting the porches thrust their branches out to them, and the mother's not sure if it's attraction to light or beggary.

Flat On My Back

I lie in the grass facing puffy pillow clouds that swallow and then spit out all manner of aircraft.

I'm no more self-conscious than the clouds are of their condensation, and the jets of their Teflon-aluminum bodies.
Dragonflies flitter over me;
I'm keenly aware of them, vaguely aware of myself.

Weed Power

New black fabric underlays the mulch we just spread around our flowers, but already weeds are growing through it.
How can this be, that a flimsy blade can force its way through tough fabric?
Overnight rain has turned the yard to mud because it couldn't soak into the clay soil, but a long trail of weeds rubs the mud off so that when I get in the house
I can walk on the carpet and leave no trace.

One Bed Over

It was my coffee cake, but here was Kenny, always shunned, in the bed next to mine eating a piece I'd broken off for him.
It would've been my last mouthful, but he ate it as if it were his every ungranted wish.
A burr-sized crumb fell on his bedsheet, and he wet his forefinger, pressed it into the bed and lifted the crumb to his mouth.

Behind Golden Corral

Golden Corral won't open for another three minutes, so I walk behind it, and enter brush that opens into a dirt clearing garnished with crushed rock.
I relieve myself on a billing company's stained tri-fold letter lying next to the slit window envelope it came in.
But Golden Corral is about to unlock its doors.
It's time to eat, not wonder if the bill was ever paid.

Too Much On Their Minds

If you look carefully you'll notice that none of the cut blocks set in the concrete wall that partitions the homes behind it from the main road in front of it are identical.

But to drivers on the main road with too much on their minds the stones are people on the platform of a local stop seen by someone on an express thundering by.

To Know Without Knowing

Every hue was part of a strategy:
He mixed them into reds and oranges and browns;
he mixed red with orange, orange with brown, then red with brown.
He added black and white, mixing them into grey.
He knew exactly where to lay the paint, how to swipe the brush and knife.
When it was finished El Greco had a sky that resembled the mental state of a man five-hundred years in the future.
El Greco knew me without knowing me.

Acknowledgement

I spend all day walking, exploring trails and their spurs, sweating under my backpack.
I talk to the hills, they don't respond.
I talk to the trees, they ignore me.
I sing for the flowers,
my reward is silence.
I'll be so glad to get home to you just to have some conversation.

Stones In Autumn

Magenta and vermilion blooms pop out from a bush;
a prospering crepe myrtle advances yellow plumage; mallards paddle on a lake that moves with the slightest wind; sidewalk borders bulge with rocks in their natural state--grey, white and brown-- enough to stone every lawbreaker.

In The Sleep Research Center

A small square frame with a woodcarver's labyrinthine vision, inside it an impressionistic painting:
A crop field in pink and blue, pink where sunshine is the brightest, getting smaller as it disappears into olive and turquoise leafage.
When the medical assistant calls me
I'll be somewhere hidden in the furrows.

Morning Stroll, Thanksgiving Day

Overcast sky, a vendor of clouds for every taste; layer cake landscaping
of white stones and black mulch; chalk markings on the asphalt for the water department crew; rebar breaking free from its sidewalk tomb;
old effaced wooden skateboard split lengthwise, all milage used up.

Party Laughter

Saturday afternoon, a patio party next door; stereophonic sounds, unfamiliar music;
people sitting and walking, eating and laughing, in the spaces between the fence boards;
black solar panels inscrutable, enigmatic; Palm fronds on the far end of the patio, each torn into hanging fringes;
afternoon shadows move westward, shade for a dozen laughs in a dozen pitches and tempos.

Living Together

Green knolls and dips
live with lawn edgers
and riding mowers;
shrubs and bushes
live with branch loppers
and hedge trimmers;
marigolds and thyme
live with cultivators
and garden spades;
manure and topsoil
live with hoes, rakes
and seed spreaders;
dogwoods and elms
live with birding guidebooks and tree surgeons.

Evening Rush

White headlights moving slowly south, amber taillights moving slowly north, on the freeway, on the ramps, on the parallel frontage road.
Speedometers that go up to one-twenty hover between zero and ten.
Hidden in the ranks of this march of lights a driver and her rider, their faces lost in the dark of their car's interior, tool around a rural backroad on a bright morning in a hand-cranked horseless carriage that runs only on imagination.

Valero Station

The Valero station down the street is closed.
The gas pumps are gone, the mini mart is dark, and within that dark store are unopened boxes and deposit bags and file trays and desk drawers.
In the tiniest desk drawer old receipts are crammed in so tight that if the drawer were opened some of them would spill behind into the cabinet, including the one that has on the back the illegible code to the safe.

The Great Wall

Before there were superhighways that cut through everything in their path, that drove snakes
from their mating grounds and cut deer off
from their watering holes, there was this great wall in China that was raised from the earth and belonged with the earth.
To imagine those hills without the wall would be to imagine a coral snake without its rings.

Just After Sunrise

The blinds are closed, but the quarter inch between slats lets enough light through to show the knobby crown of the bedpost.

I hear the thermostat kick on, I smell composite wood.

I feel my weight on the mattress, the ceiling fan's draft.

I know it's Tuesday, November, Scorpio rising.

But waking up at night with deadened senses my eyes open to a place as dark as unconsciousness, a place of no discernment, no location.

It's as deep and as far as the last outpost of the universe—deeper than brain waves, deeper than neurotransmission, further than zero mass, further than sequential time.

About the Author

Barney Warren is a native Brooklynite whose urge to write poetry grew out of an abiding love for the New York Yankees of the era in which he was raised. Barney has outgrown neither his urge to write nor his love for the Yankees of that bygone era. However, his subject matter now includes everything that reaches his very city-honed sense receptors. His mind is a fully actuated urban development master plan, and he doesn't expect to be nominated for Cowboy Poet of the Year.
